So, I have a young son and, sometimes, he's kind of a mystery to me. With my daughter, I knew what I was getting into. Not only did I used to be a little girl, but I have several nieces who I've seen through childhood (I do also have a nephew, but he grew up far from us and we only saw him a couple of times a year). When I found this book, I thought it might shed some light on what was going on with my little guy. And, yes, it did shed some light for me. Biddulph goes through biological, its fair share of unique and important insight as well. After reading this book I have been able to gauge what the childhood experience was like for a lot of people that I meet and understand them a little bit better. I would not rely solely on this book as a standalone but would also read Children Are From Heaven by John Gray because it covers the different types of temperaments for children and how to approach them.

I read a long time ago and had forgotten how useful this book is. Reconnecting with it for a teenager is great.

I'm not sure if our book is a 'misprint', but I'm about 1/3 through the book and there have been at least five sections that ended mid sentence without completing the thought. I honestly believe my copy has missing pages. Despite that, I'm finding the book interesting. It's a good overview that's worth reading. If anyone knows how that lab study ends, please help!
